Recent update about Active Folate, Homocysteine and Mobility in Older Adults

Very recent prospective data suggest that homocysteine is a potentially modifiable risk factor for mobility decline and its lowering may be a possible target for intervention to prevent mobility decline in older adults.

Quatrefolic® is the active folate that may help to decrease high homocysteine levels, found to be related to lower muscle strength in older adults especially women. Read more >>

"Science UP" about Quatrefolic®: ACTIVE FOLATE and the ELDERLY

The aging process may affect the proper nutritional status in the elderly.

In particular, folate deficiency is high among individuals aged 65 and may reach approximately 30% of aging population.

The lack of this vitamin is mainly due to the reduced dietary intake, intestinal malabsorption and impairment of metabolism. The body in fact is able to store folate to a limited extent, as humans cannot synthesize folate, also due to its water-soluble nature.

This edition of science UP has been issued to reinforce the need to pay attention to the critical age group of the elderly, who can benefit significantly from the intake of folates like Quatrefolic® - the innovActive folate, that can be immediately used by the body without any kind of metabolism.
